Introduction

The wood bowl is an object that has been utilized for centuries by diverse cultures. As part of our everyday lives, it is so familiar to us that it can easily be taken for granted. Yet, for contemporary artists who work in wood, the bowl represents a form with tremendous potential, from revealing the beauty of nature to sharing an artistic vision or concept.

Over the last few decades, the wood bowl has been reinvented as an artistic medium and is today approached by artists and craftspeople all over the world as both iconic form and point of departure for self-expression.

Many of the bowls in this book are related to the woodturning movement that grew out of a number of pioneering artists working in different regions, inspired by wide-ranging approaches. They include a member of the Chicago Bauhaus, James Prestini, who has been credited with the birth of this new art form; Bob Stocksdale, who refined the turned wood bowl in his Northern California workshop over five decades; Mel Lindquist, who was creating hollow vessels on the East Coast; and Rude Osolnik, who lived on a mountaintop in Kentucky and took a folk-craft approach to the vessel.

While these artists had no intention of pioneering a new art form, they experimented with new approaches and created work that came to influence many wood artists who followed. The most important of these, Mark Lindquist, David Ellsworth, and William Hunter, took it all to the next level, creating new standards and pushing the craft into the realm of art. Over the last two decades, a number of artists became part of this new movement, contributing more ideas and pushing the field ahead.

Of course, the work in this book represents a wide range of technical approaches, from chisel to chainsaw and router to bandsaw. Some artists carve on the surface of their vessels or utilize paint and mixed media approaches, while many accept what nature has offered and simply sand and seal the wood.

Along with the potential to create thinner, more complex forms, technical breakthroughs have allowed wood artists to create vessels. Since wood can't be used to hold liquid, these forms made little sense as vases. Yet these new forms expanded the language, just as lids offered the potential of container forms. While being expanded upon in relation to utilitarian forms, the wood bowl also came to be abstracted and deconstructed, offering an excellent point of departure for sculptural pursuits.

It is no surprise that the wood bowl has come to serve as a means of self-expression for artists internationally. Historically, wood bowls and vessels have been used for their decorative potential in the Western world and for ceremonial purposes in the East and in indigenous societies. Due to technical and aesthetic breakthroughs, today's forms offer bold and original approaches. They echo their rich history, present contemporary visions, and carry the voice of nature itself.

500 Wood Bowls presents an international array of work created for both utilitarian purposes and artist exploration, featuring artists crucial to the development of the contemporary approach and the best of a new generation of artists who continue to explore it. The work in this book is, indeed, the state of the art.

"I never liked the lathe. I feel it's restricting. That's why I carve....I'm interested in organic and natural forms. The protruding carved parts on this piece are like seed pods, little buds, or nodules. They act like handles and are very sensual and soothing. For me, they are nice forms to carve and look at." —J.C.

"These bowls are turned on a lathe. When the turnings are finished, the rims are incised and textured. The inserts, made of copper, silver, and gold, are made by fusing the metals together with a gas torch. Then they're precisely fitted to the openings in the rims before they're epoxied into place. Finally, finish is applied to the piece." —A.S.

"I enjoy turning different woods, but when a friend gave me some rounds from a palm tree removed in a street renovation project, I was somewhat perplexed. Unlike familiar tree trunks with annual rings, palm wood is composed of a soft, wet, pithy substance dotted with hundreds of tough, vertical fibers. After I turned a bowl on the lathe, I found that it was difficult to sand and subject to chipping. After some experimentation, I found that scraping and brushing the surface revealed the hard fibers and fuzzy filaments that make up the interesting texture of this piece." —D.G.

"I've always enjoyed architecture and the elements and motifs that make buildings interesting to view. For this reason, I wanted to design a bowl that incorporated some of the familiar features of classical buildings—such as columns, elevations, and decorations. I was drawn by memories of a long-ago visit to Rome and the Coliseum. I remembered the enormity of the structure, the reminders of the gruesome spectacles of combat, and, curiously, the ever-present cats. I designed this piece to reflect numerous architectural elements, including a central bowl reminiscent of the huge amphitheater. As I made the piece, I realized an additional feature—the bowl can be inverted to make a dome." —D.G.

"The graceful lines of the Greek amphora, a vessel often found in ancient shipwrecks, inspired the shape of this bowl. The legs allow it to stand on its own....Carving oak burl with hand tools is a sensuous task that requires intense focus. The grains of the wood run in contrary directions, and it is hard in most places but has a cork-like consistency in others." —T.M.S.

"I can be upset and feel terrible, then make something with my hands, and soon I don't have a care in the world.... I prefer odd shapes over round ones. I follow the shape of the burl as much as I can when I'm trying to make the piece thin. The deeper into the burl you go, the more beautiful the grain. The shapes evolve, and the piece creates itself," —N.A.

"Most bowls are balanced on a foot. They have a powerful sense of symmetry and, as a result, a feeling of stability. I wanted something different. I wanted the bowl to seem to be in motion, to appear to be dancing. So, rather than having a single foot, it has two legs and seems to be momentarily standing on one leg while exuberantly kicking up the other in the air." —W.M.

"When I started working in wood, my color palette was derived from natural wood colors. Somehow it seemed dishonest to color the wood. Then I started working with an electric guitar maker who didn't think in the restricted ways much of the 'wood world' seems to. It planted a seed for me. Now, I see the wood form as my canvas. Both elements—form and color—are equally important. I love bright colors—they help me get through the dark Maine winter." —S.G.

"When I began carving this form there was no preconceived idea of its finished shape or what it would ultimately resemble. This intuitive approach frees my mind to suggest a wide range of sculptural possibilities from life experiences.

Centipede reminds me of something I experienced a few years ago when a centipede dropped from a piece of firewood and looked like a bolt of lightning crossing the floor. It was absolutely electric! The sculpture's geometric shapes, hard straight edges, and chiseled surfaces are strikingly reminiscent of this lightning bolt," —D.G.

"This piece was inspired by a Japanese fishing net with floats." —D.N.

"I became interested in the plight of sea turtles after reading an article about them. Mankind, pollution, fishing, and so forth (as well as their natural predators) have all had an impact on their lives. Out of a thousand hatchlings, only one of those little guys makes it to adulthood! I was shocked by that fact. In this piece, we're paying homage to an animal that has lived millions of years and is now threatened to a great degree by man's lifestyle. I asked Journal Thomas to turn a bowl of this particular shape, and I placed it on my raku piece inspired by an ancient Persian ceremonial stand." —G.C.

"When creating my work, I simply think in terms of form; there's no verbal process I go through. I bring together simple forms in a way that I think is unusual and allows viewers to fill in their own details. I don't have a hidden meaning, so I make up words for the titles....I start with the vessel so that people can see something that was once functional made into something non-functional." —H.M.

"After turning hundreds of plain bowls, I wanted to try something different. I wanted a natural, yet unnatural feel. My interest in spiders and insects surfaced in Scurry and then expanded from there. I really like making bowls with legs. "The piece, Looking for Orion, deals loosely with my experiences growing up in the South, where dramatic evening stars and daddy longlegs were common couplings on summer nights.... This piece is about the nostalgia I have for lying in the grass, in a field full of insects and critters, trying to identify familiar constellations. Reminiscent of these experiences, I made the interior of the bowl a skyscape and attached small daddy longleg spiders to both the interior and exterior of the vessel." —J.G.

"I woodburned the words of a poem onto all the grooves on the inside bottom of the bowl. The poem reads as follows:

a baby cries and a bird sings and the gears turn and a cradle rocks and the light dims and the stars shine and the wing takes flight and strong night winds blow and the baby calms and the world turns and the planets fly around mother sun in a milky way and the branch sways as the air stills and child sleeps and night wakes and the tides changed and grass grew and water flowed and the seas swelled and life goes on and that spiral whirls and those seasons spend and the sky bends and the heart mends and the circle is unbroken and the feathers give way and the night now can take its flight and the sun can rise and the stars dim and the light shines and the cradle rocks and the baby wakes and the bird sings and the song is the same and rockabye my song bird"

"The use of an elongated shape was a phase of exploration that I had already worked through, but the potential of longer canoe-shaped forms allowed me to explore an alternative to simple faceplate work. By joining two gobletlike forms, I was able to explore vessels that changed when viewed from different perspectives.

My inspiration comes from many things in life. I am a keen traveler...I love Africa and parts of Asia. I look at works of other cultures and try to understand why they are created. These experiences often influence work produced later..." —A.P.

"Canyon Ruins is a prime example of a piece that has a mystery and a story. In it, you are exploring the canyon lands of the Southwest, and you come upon the ruins of an ancient pueblo. The pattern of the crumbling stone walls can still be seen, and there is a cache of pottery and baskets, as well as petroglyphs on the canyon walls. Though the ruins seem deserted, they are inhabited with numerous birds, lizards, and mammals carved into the scene. In the very center is the kiva with a carved ladder going down into the chamber. You can just glimpse inside where the ancient ceremonies took place, and you can almost still hear the chanting and smell the smoke. It's like having your own archeological zone, and you can go exploring there anytime." —T.R. and K.W.

"My carved forms are constructions made from exotic lathe-turned woods that are deconstructed in an effort to activate and animate the forms. I feel that this process imparts a sense of motion, life, and content.

Dancing Impact evolved from earlier works that were created as studies of fracturing flowering forms. As the fractures began to grow in these forms over time, the process led me to the idea of juxtaposed materials held together at the waist, as if in the thralls of joyous dancing." —B.L.

"Most of my life has been spent in rural Australia where the land is both harsh and sensuous, stripped bare but generating life. The forms of the natural world, such as the lips of opening seed pods and the rounded smoothness of stones and shells sculpted by the sea, have become a source of inspiration for the forms I create." —G.V.

"Almost every piece of artwork I make is a portrait or representation of human character. The Suture Series came from my attraction to breaking things down and reassembling them. To combine these two interests, I used the simple shape of a bowl to illustrate how people are an accumulation of experiences and choices. Each part is dependent on the other to make a whole person.

One of the things I truly enjoy is watching the surprise on people's faces when they first pick up the bowl and realize how light it is and how it flexes and moves in their hands." —M.F.

"Sylvan Plane was just the second piece of many that I made over the course of a dozen years using thorns as either a textural, symbolic, or structural aspect. For this piece, I thought of the vessel stretched horizontally as landscape, with the locust thorns as a reference to forest. On a personal level, this piece represents a point in time when I began the transition from pure woodturning to exploring the creative and sculptural possibilities of lathe-based woodworking." —D.S.

"I call my work 'basket illusion.' I have studied basketry, including Islamic, African, and Native American. I like the intricate detail in the weaving. My work speaks to that detail.... *The pieces I create are all carved by hand. Much thought and deliberation is applied to each piece before the carving or turning even begins. Ideas for my pieces always originate from nature; I constantly observe my natural surroundings with open eyes and mind. Each piece of wood also has a unique grain and texture, and I always find that the wood itself dictates its ultimate composition. I pay closest attention to this when selecting the right piece of wood to carve." —N.O.

"With this piece, we wanted to create a landscape bowl that could change with the seasons. One side of the lid is summer with pine trees, a pond with a sky reflection embroidery underneath, and farm fields of various hardwoods. Flipped over, the other side of the lid shows the same scene in winter, using holly as the snow and maple as the shadows of clouds floating over." —T.R.

"Cushioned Bowl is concerned with the interpenetration of natural and manmade worlds. To insure visual integrity, I used a single block of curly maple, rather than a construction of a turned bowl attached to a carved pillow. The unlikely juxtaposition of forms and textures reinforces the sense that this object is reaching beyond daily reality. I refer to this type of work as a still life rather than a trompe l'oeil piece....A still life transcends the amusing visual joke or facile exhibition of skill inherent in trompe l'oeil; it is, rather, an object of contemplation and inspiration." —M.H.

"I enjoy placing a common thing in an unexpected place. I want people to enjoy the company of my art and for it to generate thought and questions, such as 'How did he do that?', 'Can that actually function?', or 'Isn't that an interesting piece?' I don't want my work to be so limiting and esoteric that only a few understand it," —P.S.

"The concept of incorporating zippers at the openings in this piece came to me when I looked at a log and wished that I could open it up to see inside before cutting into it." — P.S.

"In my carved pieces I create shapes with free-flowing lines inspired by our natural environment. We live in a setting surrounded by rolling hills that meet the Pacific Ocean not far from our home. I draw inspiration from the imagery of the beach, the windblown patterns on the sand, and the shape and form of the waves. The legs are also curved, carrying the theme. They give height to the piece and create the illusion of it floating, making a very fine point of contact with the display surface." —N.S.

"The name Keeper has a personal story behind it. I remember a time when I was a boy out by our river looking for a Christmas tree. When I spotted one across the ice, I tried to lead the horse over, but he wouldn't go. The ice gave way in front of me, nearly sending me into the swirling current below. Years later, I learned that these whirlpools are also known as keepers, because they drag you under and won't give you back." —L.L.

"There is no steam bending or chemical manipulation in my work. I start with a solid piece of green or wet wood. Using a hydraulic chain saw, I carve the inside of the vessel first. I then refine the form using an arsenal of carving tools. It is then allowed to dry, refined again and sanded to completion.

My process is spontaneous, much like jazz improvisation. I am conscious of the natural bark edge and like to create a sense of flow. I'm inspired by the tree's natural form. I attempt to bring out the beauty and spirit of the tree in harmony with the form that is created." —B.S.

"Working with burls is like breaking open a geode and discovering hidden treasure. The natural exterior of the burl is rough, but my turned work creates a surface that is like a polished gemstone. The gilding (gold leaf) accentuates the natural texture of the wood. Gilding the inside of the piece creates a glow where you would least expect it." —C.D.

"Periodically, the cat startles birds on my feeder. These birds taking flight remind me of this sculpture's upward thrusting lines and planes. As I carved the piece, I allowed the form to evolve intuitively, and in the finishing stage, accentuated its movement with smooth edges and planes. In my pieces, I attempt to creatively explore space defined by the bowl or vessel in the form of abstract sculptures." —D.G.

About the Jurors

Ray Leier and Jan Peters, co-founders of del Mano Gallery in Los Angeles, have been involved in the contemporary craft movement since 1973. Kevin Wallace is a widely published writer and curator in the field of contemporary craft art.

Over the years, under the direction of their founders, del Mano Gallery has become a leading force in the contemporary wood art movement. The gallery has presented annual exhibitions and produced accompanying catalogues through work with major collectors and national museums.

Ray Leier is a founding member of the American Association of Woodturners, and currently serves on the board of directors of the Woodturning Center, Philadelphia. Jan Peters currently serves on the board of directors of the Collectors of Wood as well as on the boards of the National Basketry Organization and the Glass Alliance of Los Angeles.

Jan Peters and Ray Leier, along with Kevin Wallace, began a series of books on contemporary crafts published by Handbooks Press. Their first book, Contemporary Turned Wood: New Perspectives in a Rich Tradition, published in 1999, presented a major survey of the wood art field rich in talent, beauty, and innovation. Baskets: Tradition and Beyond, featuring a varied and accomplished selection of work in the field of basketry, was published in 2000. Contemporary Glass: Color, Light & Form, a review of contemporary glass artists, followed in 2001.

At the 5th Annual Forum of the Collectors of Wood Art, held in 2001, Ray Leier and Jan Peters were awarded the "Lifetime Achievement Award" in recognition of their many years of significant leadership and their visionary role in the field of contemporary wood art.

Kevin Wallace has served as guest curator for exhibitions at major museums such as the Los Angeles County Museum of Art, the Long Beach Museum of Art, and the Los Angeles Craft and Folk Art Museum. He is a regular contributor to a number of publications, including Craft Arts International, Woodturning, Turning Points, Woodwork, and American Style.

Acknowledgments

Thanks to the jurors—Ray Leier, Jan Peters, and Kevin Wallace—who were instrumental in the formation of this book. Due to their encouragement of many artists, this book showcases some of the best work in the world today.

The highest praise goes out to Nathalie Mornu of Lark Books, who cheerfully took care of endless administrative details such as answering an onslaught of e-mails and calls during the submission process, preparing slides, and writing detailed captions. Thanks also to Delores Gosnell and Rosemary Kast of Lark Books, who assisted in the long process of entering data and preparing slides for jurying. Lark interns, Rose McLamey and Ryan Sniatecki also assisted with research as needed.

Thanks to the discretionary eye of Art Director Kristi Pfeiffer, this book allows the work to be seen in its best possible light—set off by clean, spare design. Her chosen arrangement and juxtaposition of images brings synergy to this compilation of diverse work by many artists.

500 WOOD BOWLS

The wooden bowl
rediscovered

This sumptuous, full-color photographic collection features 500 masterworks from today's finest contemporary woodcraft artisans. Using age-old hand tools and modern machines, these artists bend and shape the wood, blending inspiration and technical innovation with cultural influences from Asia, Europe, and the Americas to create fantastic shapes that continually delight.
